In this case the mass ratio $q = \frac{M_2}{M_1}$ is expected to play a special role as it is not related to the compactness of the primary and may influence the evolution. The fraction of secondary material that accretes on the primary increases with mass of the primary. In particular, low mass secondary stars are expected to accrete on the primary up to 70% of the stellar envelope. However, this fraction

A: First of all you might better use the file extension.mp3. It is more specific and makes the possibility of browsing them by just typing their name. Second if you want to use the "borrowed" strings as you call, you will need to use a machine learning model to learn the patterns in the data you have. I would suggest experimenting with different algorithms and trying to tune them, and then try to "translate" the sentences you have using that model. You could save the resulting model as a separate file and then run it from time to time and get new translations for the text you have. But I'm afraid this is the advanced level of text translation learning, at least for now. But you will definitely find a lot of tutorials online which will help you get going. Here for example is one more or less finished tutorial: - I have not tested it.

Q: TypeScript compatibility for custom intellisense I'm creating a TypeScript (2.1.4) class and adding some Intellisense/autocompletion features to it. The class is quite simple, but it does contain some custom logic so I am aware that I need to implement the JS object style but not the built-in JS this or ES6 classes. When I add the various Intellisense features to it, they don't work as expected since they expect to find the class. When I try to add a custom intellisense to a custom TypeScript class, it doesn't work. In the @typescript-eslint docs it says: Since tsc 2.0, this feature is supported by declaring the TypeScript types in the type definition itself and letting eslint run that type definition. I'm using tsc 2.1.4 so this is what I tried: export interface Class {} export class MyClass{ private message: string; constructor(private message: string){} function private method() { return this.message } } and then adding the two rules to my.eslintrc.json: { "rules": { "no-
