Simultaneously.Deutsche Bank has announced plans to open a new Frankfurt Bitcoin trading desk, according to an announcement on the bank's website (see full article here). The announcement comes months after we reported that the institution had begun trialing transaction services using the blockchain. As reported at the time, the new service is being trialed out of the bank's technology and research labs in Frankfurt, under the name 'Testbed Deutschland' (Testbed Germany). It marks the first use of blockchain technology by a major financial institution, and marks another step forward for the space. Although some are concerned about the potential costs associated with blockchain technology, the move could herald a new era of financial innovation. The announcement makes it clear that the service will only be open to "a selected group of knowledgeable customers" initially. Deutsche's announcement reads: "Deutsche Bank has decided to establish a new dedicated asset custody platform, in close collaboration with other German financial institutions. The Testbed Deutschland [...], which will be based at the Deutsche Bank Technology Centre in Frankfurt, is meant to test and examine the prospective technology solutions for access and custody of virtual currencies."
